BRINK, Joseph Martin

CG: 18 December 2010
GH: 29 September 2010
DOI: 15 January 2006

“On January 15, 2006, Sergeant Brink demonstrated exemplary leadership as the section commander during an attack on his patrol convoy by a suicide vehicle borne improvised explosive device. He quickly established a security perimeter and sent a detailed report to command headquarters, which allowed for the rapid dispatch of the quick reaction force to provide assistance at the scene. He then entered a burning, overturned and ammunition-laden vehicle to render aid to a trapped and seriously injured soldier until that soldier could be safely extracted. Sergeant Brink’s perseverance and performance under extreme duress were exceptional.”

Medals: MSC – Campaign General Service Star – Peacekeeping – NATO (SFOR) (2)

Sergeant Joseph Martin BRINK, MSC, PPCLI

On January 15, 2006, Brink was section commander of a patrol to escort an RCMP Superintendent and a Canadian diplomat to a small village south of Kandahar City where they were conducting a meeting with the elders to establish what the town needed. The meeting took most of the morning and then they headed back to base, stopping at Kandahar Airfield halfway back for lunch.

It was there the first inkling of potential trouble arose. They were delayed leaving the airfield because of the threat of improvised explosive devices (IED) along one of the routes back to the base. About an hour later, after investigation deemed the route clear, they decided to go. “We chose to take the paved route,” he said, noting it was safer because IEDs are usually dug into the road.

“The patrol back to Kandahar City was pretty uneventful. We entered the big arched gates to Kandahar City and had to reduce our speed down to about 40 km/hr. because of wall-to-wall traffic we couldn’t avoid. “As we entered the city we approached a taxi stand with about 25 taxis congregated in one area.” Brink was in the first of their four vehicle convoy and passed the stand. “The second vehicle, as it passed the stand, was struck by a taxi that was parallel parked along the edge and angled out to the second vehicle detonating explosives. He (the driver) blew himself up instantly sending the second vehicle, a Mercedes G wagon with upgraded armour about 20 feet into the air and 50 metres across the highway.” There were five high explosive artillery shells in the trunk of the taxi.

“It went over top of a four foot cement wall between two lanes of traffic and landed against a building on the opposite side of the road.”

“Once I heard the blast I looked in the rear view mirror and saw nothing but smoke, then one of my vehicles came through it. What I didn’t realize for a split second was the vehicle coming through was our third vehicle. About the same time my second in command radioed we’d been hit. Right away I was on command radio and radioed headquarters a contact report, and called for the quick reaction force to deploy. We were less than 600 metres from home camp. Headquarters asked how many sections of back-up we needed, the usual complement is one, I asked for two because a major crowd was gathering.

“We were just a block away from the Afghan police station and those guys came over and helped establish a perimeter. Once that was set we did a survey of the scene. My second in command and another corporal were already at the damaged vehicle rendering whatever aid they could. The driver, a medic, (M/Cpl. Paul Franklin) was thrown from the vehicle and was missing a leg. I brought the last vehicle forward, the driver and gunner loaded the medic in the vehicle and once I did a threat assessment, because we were so close, I sent the vehicle by itself back to camp. The medic was at risk of dying at that point, I knew we needed quick reaction.”

Next Brink determined what had happened to the rest of the passengers in the vehicle. "The commander (Cpl. Jeff Bailey) of that vehicle was found face down in a ditch. My second in command had pulled him from the ditch and was rendering first aid. It was obvious he had brain damage and was unconscious. Next I saw the diplomat, Glyn Berry, who was obviously dead laying in an alley so I covered him up with a mat. There was one private missing. I went to look for him, went into the vehicle which was opened like a tin can and laying on its side. I could hear breathing, very laboured, I called his name and got no response.

"There was a bunch of ballistic plates and glass all over the place. I started throwing it out of the way the best I could. Finally I uncovered his body, he was still alive but unconscious and bleeding from the ears and nose. I took off his helmet, loosened his clothing, he was partly trapped. My biggest concern was an M72 rocket launcher underneath his arm that had been crushed open, split lengthwise with the rocket exposed. With the heat present and trauma done to the wrapper of the ammunition I wasn't able to move the private at that time because of the risk of further explosion. I rendered first aid and stayed with him until the quick reaction force arrived six minutes after the initial blast — which felt like an eternity. With the quick reaction force was also a group of explosives engineers who were able to render the ammunition safe and then could extract Private William Salakin.

"Once all men were accounted for and placed inside an armoured Bison ambulance they were brought into the Provincial Reconstruction Team base in Kandahar City." All three, were flown from there by Black Hawk helicopter to Kandahar Airfield for further assessment and then taken to Germany.

Berry, who was serving as political director for the Department of Foreign Affairs to the Provincial Reconstruction Team, was the first Canadian diplomat to be killed while on duty in Afghanistan.

Brink said he still keeps in touch with the three soldiers who were wounded during the incident. Franklin lost his other leg as well but is otherwise healthy. He has set up a foundation to improve the lives of other amputees and has had the story of overcoming his injuries featured in a book.

"Lieutenant-Colonel Thibault for exceptional professionalism, as the aircraft commander onboard a Cormorant helicopter that provided critical command decisions during a rescue at sea on 09 June 2009."

"On the morning of June 9, 2008, the aircrew of Cormorant Helicopter Rescue 913 successfully evacuated a critically injured sailor from the MV Maersk Dunedin, near Halifax. Aircraft Commander Lieutenant-Colonel Thibault made critical command decisions as he piloted the aircraft under exceptionally demanding circumstances. He was assisted by First Officer Captain Mercer, who helped fly the aircraft for nearly 10 hours, twice landing on Sable Island for fuel as the aircraft's endurance was pushed to its limits. In conditions where visibility was so poor that they could not even see the vessel in distress, flight engineer Sergeant Pawulski was instrumental in providing advice to help guide the aircraft into position over the deck in order to facilitate the hoist operation. Search and rescue technicians Warrant Officer Mitchell and Sergeant Kelland were then lowered onto the heaving deck, where they rendered life-saving medical aid to the injured sailor and coordinated his removal to the rescue helicopter. The team's conduct, dedication and professionalism in the planning and execution of this daring rescue brought great credit to the Canadian Forces."

The colonel heard the first bang and knew exactly what it was. He had served in Croatia and Bosnia in the mid-1990s and spent 10 months in 2011 as the commander of Canada's 1,300-strong battle group in Kandahar, Afghanistan. The 47-year-old caught some movement in his rearview mirror, turned in his seat and saw Zehaf-Bibeau shoot Cirillo the second time. "I was filled with surprise and rage," he says. He pulled a quick U-turn—narrowly missing an oncoming OC Transpo bus—and gunned the engine of his little Nissan Versa. "What we look to do first is neutralize the threat, so I had it in my mind that I was going to take my car and I was going to drive over that gunman." It soon became obvious that the compact would never make it past the cement bollards surrounding the plaza, so he abandoned the car on the edge of the sidewalk and ran to join the efforts to save Cirillo.
